Planning in Innis responds to the anticipated expansion of the DeGroote School of Business. In the absence of final details the expansion is shown to the east, but with recognition that the actual expansion may take a different shape. Granular elements are grouped to the sides of the plan, providing visual continuity from the front door all the way through the space and allowing for a variety of different activities to take place. Public functions—including the staff point, two presentation rooms, and the proposed incubator space—are located along the north edge, while group study rooms are clustered to the south, buffered by a continuous row of stacks. New quiet and silent study areas occupy the proposed expansion. As in the other libraries, partitions between general learning areas and specialised functions are envisioned as glass walls that provide adequate acoustic separation while allowing light to filter deep into the centre of the plan.